William of Orango. Editors of the Dispatch: Gentlemen,— With the spirit or conclusions of the com-munication on "Party" in the Dispatch of yesterday I have no concern either way, and perhaps the charitable philosophy which admonishes us that matters of taste should not be themes of dispute may find excuse for the phrase of contempt with which J. R. K. is pleased to designate the religious belief of balf of Christendom. But all lovers of historic truth are interested that the scales be held everly when weighing the lovers of historic truth are interested that the scales be held everly when weighing the lovers of historic truth are interested that the scales held everly when weighing the lovers of historic truth are interested that the scales held everly when weighing the lovers of historic truth are interested and killing a white man. Our Government, when it is apprised of their destitution, will, of course, supply them with improved arms and plenty of ammunition.—Norristion Herald. character and deeds of those personages who, by reason of their power or their situations, are connected with memorable epochs in the annals of our race. I am aware that literary vanity or the spirit of paradox has induced some extraordinary pretexts in our day against old-fashioned historic judgments, and the midsummer madness and appalling brutality of Frederick William I, and the murderous lechery of Henry VIII. have found enthusiastic defenders in Carlyle and Froude. But these "vices of composition" cannot be charged to your tion. learned correspondent, who, speaking of Such is not the honest verdict of history. On the 3d day of October, 1691, the gallant fight of the loyal people of Ireland for their lawful prince ended with the fall of Limerick, and a treaty was signed and subsequently ratified by William guaranteeing religious liberty to the Irish Catholies, and political equality. This ratification was signed by William in person.

Nineteen days after this treaty was signed it was violated by this champion of religious liberty by his approval of, and signature to, an act of the English Parliament disfranchising every Catholic peer and commoner in Ireland because of his religion. (Lord's Journal, volume 1, page 496.) The 9th article of the Treaty of Limerick guaranteed the Catholics of Ireland against any oath except the oath of allegiance-a civil oath. William enacted the oath of supremacy-a religious test meant to disfranchise all Catholies. Shortly thereafter he signed an act depriving Catholics of the right to educate their children at home under penalties such as the law denounced for the most atrocious crimes; and punished by fine and imprisonment, and by the disinheriting of the innocent child, the sending by any Catholic father of his child to a foreign Catholic college to obtain the edu-cation which tolerant William punished him like a felon for seeking at home (7 William & Mary, cb. 4).

In the same year he signed an act (7 William & Mary, c. 5) depriving all men in Ireland guilty of the crime of being Catholics of the right to bear arms, and rendering legal divers robberies of Catholics. Two years afterwards he signed an act

(9 William & Mary, c. 1) banishing all Catholic clergymen from Ireland, setting a price upon their heads like wild beasts, and prohibiting their return under the penalties of tise to give away a Gail Hamilton to each felony; making-the hunting of priests a new subscriber, but it offers a dictionary as lawful and profitable game.

The same year he made it a crime for a Protestant to marry a Catholic, and punished by enormous fines Catholic clergymen who should perform that ceremony. (9 W. & M., c. 5).

The same year this superb hypocrite signed an act of Parliament confirming the treaty of Limerick (9 W. & M., c. 11). The next year he confiscated, through two millions of acres of land in Ireland because their owners were guilty of the crime of being Catholics-a robbery of $15,000,000 at one swoop-the tribute of liberty of conscience to a bigot and a tyby a Protestant historian:

"They indicted the Irish gentlemen who possessed any estates of high treason in the several counties over which they had jurisdiction, and then removed them all by certiorari to the Court of King's Bench, in Dublin. By this ingenious contrivance those who were to be robbed lost all opportunity of making their defence. Indeed, in most cases they were ignorant of their being accused." During the brief reign of William III.

there was inaugurated in Ireland the most stupendous and far-reaching scheme of religious rancor. His successors merely unfolded William's plans and perfected them, until before fifty years had passed the most complex and consummate system of religious persecution the world has ever known was visited upon the people of Ireland for the unpardonable fidelity they exhibited to their religious convictions. Those who believe that the ambitious prince of a petty-State accepted the great crown of England "for the relief of a suf-fering people and the promotion of civil and religious freedom" may be congratulated on their credulity. William had but one pas-sion (besides his illicit love for Elizabeth Villiers); and that was batred of France-a passion which, as Macaulay says, "continued to animate him even when the prayer for the departing was read at his bedside." It was to avenge the wrongs of Holland upon Lewis that he consecrated his life. He cared nothing for civil or religious freedom. He conformed to the Church of England while at heart a Calvinist. He wore the crown of Great Britain, but was never so happy as when leaving her shores. He was the spouse of an English princess, but was notoriously unfaithful to her. He never cared enough for the politics of his kingdom to be a Whig or Tory. He guaranteed civil and religious freedom to Ireland, and broke his oath like a highwayman. He swore with uplifted hand "that he would in his kingdom of Scotland repress, in all estates and degrees, all oppression, and would do justice without acceptance of persons, as he hoped for mercy from the Father of all mercies"; and he connived at, if he did not authorize, the massacre of a whole Highland tribe hastening to take the oath of allegiance to him, a day too late.
